ROBBER FOILED

By ALVAH MILTON KERR

Prindle, our line repairer, was rather siender, but with highly developed muscles in fingers, arms and shoulders, and with nerve to face anything. Several years of labor with the pliers had given him a finger-grip which caused his chums to avoid shaking hands with him. He could make an insulator tie with a No. 6 iron wire with instant later he saw the door of the apparent ease. This remarkable power of concentration in the finger muscles once saved Lim from probable death.

In 1893 a local company in Layton had installed a telephone exchange. Several of their wires paralleled the telegraph wires along the tracks, and also those of the lighting and power company in the streets. The result was a bad case of induction, that mysterious transference of electrical impulse between wires when there is no direct connection.

So great was the influence of the telegraph and power wires on the the rattle and clicking of our Instruments could be distinctly heard in the telephone receivers, and the singing snarl of the dynamos at the power house annoyed every one trying to use the 'phone.

The manager angrily declared that some enemy of his company had thrown thread-like copper wires across from wire to wire, thus tangling up the currents.

Prindle "went over" the wires carefully twice and reported that he could find no "cross" of that sort. Still he kept his eye upon the wires, mainly because the telephone manager's daughter was his very best friend.

Emerging from the manager's house one night near the hour of 12, he noticed a dark figure stealing down a side street. Touched with suspicion, Prindle followed after the skulking suddenly alive in his mind. Presently the figure crossed a moonlit street and entered an alley leading fore the next onset. between two business blocks. Through the alley ran the wires of both the across the roof some eight or nine feet telephone and power companies, and above the floor. Prindle drew a pair Prindle crept carefully through the of rubber-faced gloves from his pocket, shadows at the base of the building keeping his eye on the man ahead of up and caught the wire. As he dehim. Suddenly, and to the lineman's astonishment, the man began walking the roof. Instantly he caught up the up one of the telephone poles.

'Pon my soul," gasped Prindle, "if he hasn't got spurs strapped on his shoes! I guess Manager Towne must be right; some one's tampering with the wires! I'll nail the rogue when he comes down."

With tingling nerves he crept nearer: but, to his amazement, the climber stopped before reaching the crossarm and skillfully threw the ironhooked end of a rope ladder over the sill of an open window in the side of the building, some six feet away. The other end of the ladder he strapped to the pole, then carefully crept across fell in a knotted, quivering heap. The the bridge thus formed and disappeared through the window.

Prindle fetched a low whistle looked all around. "Whew!" he half whispered, "this is interesting and no mistake! That chap has gone into a room above the bank! Must be he's

He stood in silence, looking up at soft rasping of some sort of instru- cuits had been run by the telephone ment came to his ears. Placing his his hand on his hip pocket to see if found the troublesome electrical inthe little pistol he carried when out late at night was there, he slipped off his shoes and began climbing the pole. Slowly and carefully he drew himself up until his hand was on the strap of the ladder, then he paused. The rasping noise had ceased.

"If that fellow hears me he will likely come to the window and shoot me in the face," was Prindle's thought. He hung perfectly motionless for a strong beating of his heart. Then the rasping sound began again.

Immediately the lineman drew himself higher. Then, taking his pistol in his hand, he crept warily across the rope bridge and in at the window. Letting himself down on the floor, he stood still. The rasping sound came from a closet at the back end of the room.

"He is sawing through the floor with the expectation of working his way through the brickwork covering the top of the ben't vault," was Prindle's bility of what you eat, and it need no mental comment.

With pistol in hand he began step ping craftly toward the closet, but a board in the floor creaked and the muffled noise of the saw suddenly ceased. The lineman held his breath. A misty kind of darkness filled the room, the moon's radiance being reflected dimly from the opposite wall of the alley. An closet pushed open and the outline of a human form rising in the opening. To the burglar the dim and immovable figure in the middle of the room must have seemed frightful. Had Prindle not spoken it is possible the robber would have fallen on his knees, thinking he was confronted by a spirit, but when Prindle said quietly, though with a distinguishable tremor of excitement: "Throw up your hands, mister, or I'll fire," a sudden fury of energy moved the man. He came across the room in one long leap and struck against Prindle like a bolt. The lineman went against the wall with a in it a sign that American wives will wires of the telephone company that thud and the pistol struck the ceiling not endure the treatment that Euand exploded. The burglar whirled round and disappeared through an inner door leading into the passage-

> Prindle hastily felt about the floor for the revolver, but the weapon not meeting his hand at once he rushed after the burglar. His blood was on fire with anger. Listening an instant, he heard feet flying up the stairs above him. Apparently the robber had planned to escape to the roof and slide down a rain pipe into the dark alley at the rear.

> Prindle sprang up through the roofhatch as the man crossed the almost flat roof toward the rear, and caught him as he reached the low parapet wall at the roof's edge.

The robber was of larger and heav ler mold than the lineman, and was desperate. As they grappled he tried to draw a knife from his pocket, but Prindle clutched those awful fingers of his into the man's throat and tripped him backward. They fell together on the pitch and gravel of the roof, but the rush and fall threw Prindle beyond his antagonist, tearing his hold loose. In another breath they were together again, fighting desperately.

As they came striking and struggling into the angle of the parapet, Prindle suddenly found himself lifted bodily, and the next instant he was being pressed over the wall. Feeling himself going, he set his fingers into the biceps of the burglar's left arm and pinioned his right hand. In that the roof, then whirled and ran across with the passion of battle, he recoiled.

pulled them on, and suddenly leaped scended the wire snapped and fell to two ends of it and sprang at the robber, who met him with uplifted knife.

The cracksman seemed to divine the terrible nature of the tiny weapons in the lineman's hands, for his face blanched white. In the moonlight Prindle looked equally pale. If he could touch the robber's flesh with the bare ends of the wires he would win; if not, he would probably die by the other's knife.

It was a strange duel. They feinted several times, then struck together. The clothing was sheared away from Prindle's arm, but the burglar point of one of the live wires had gone up his sleeve, the other had punctured his neck.

When the burglar recovered his senses Prindle had him securely tied with detached pieces of the wire and was at the front parapet of the roof, figuring on getting down into the vault looking up and down the street for an officer.

The bank people gave Prindle a the window and listening. The slow, handsome reward. When metallic circompany, on his suggestion, and they duction overcome, Manager Towne declaved the plucky lineman worthy to be any man's son-in-law, and he was.

Plays Plano from Distance.

An electric piano player which plays the instrument from a distance, is the latest development in this line. The mechanism is contained in an invisible case, and is the only part of the piano player directly attached to the time, hearing nothing louder than the piano. The transmitter or actuating mechanism is contained in a small case which may be placed on a convenient stand or table. The case is connected to the piano by flexible wires.—Popular Mechanics.

Told by Rabbi Krauskopf, Who Believes in Divorce.

"Rabbi Joseph Krauskopf, our eloquent preacher," said a Philadelphian, sees good rather than evil in the frequency of American divorce. He sees ropean wives put up with. He sees in It a promise that the married men of the future will live better.

"Discussing the divorce question the other day, he told me that they who perceived only evil in it reminded him. in their illogical and confused viewpoint, of a little boy with whom he once took a stroll.

"As they strolled, they passed the young girls of a neighboring boarding school out on their daily walk. The girls moved in military formation, two by two. In front were the youngest, in skirts to their knees. Next came the older ones, in the order of their ages, their skirts lengthening with their years. And in the rear came the oldest of all, the young ladies, whose skirts hid even their boots.

"The little boy looked at the girls. Then he frowned and said: "'Why is it that their legs grow shorter as they grow bigger?"
